Moments in Materials Seminar:

Ever wondered what it’s like to be an editor for a scientific publication?

A career as an editor is an interesting – yet often not considered – way to stay in science without staying in the lab. The journey to obtaining a Ph.D. equips you with the analytical skills required to oversee the peer-review process, and since editors have also been researchers and authors, we understand what’s important to authors. In this talk, I’ll share my experience going from the research lab to the other side of scientific publishing, and I’ll give an overview of what actually happens when you submit your paper into the peer-review “black box.”
